Managing Risks under Basel 3 Pillar II (ICAAP)

Background

The Internal Capital Adequacy Assessment Process (ICAAP) is important for banks, to ensure adequate risk management processes, greater rigour in stress tests and validation of models and buffers of capital and liquidity, commensurate with their risk profiles. Improper management of Pillar II risks may make banks less solvent and stable, in both normal and stressed markets. Pillar II represents an intersection between compliance needs and management opportunities.

The purpose of the ICAAP is to inform the Board of the ongoing assessment of the bank's risks, how management intends to mitigate those risks and how much current and future capital is necessary. Under Basel III, similar questions are raised about liquidity requirements as well. Pillar II is seen as a unique opportunity to narrow the gap between regulation and economic capital. A bank should evaluate whether capital targets for the long-run are consistent with short-term business goals. It should also assess whether short-run return maximization has an adverse impact on asset liquidity and funding patterns.

Objective

As the ICAAP should be customized for each bank, taking into account the particular risks and information available, the aim of the programme is to show how economic capital can be a component of a bank's ICAAP and can be implemented in its business processes like portfolio management, managing concentration risk, risk based pricing, customer profitability analysis through RAROC & EVA, portfolio optimization and management incentives. The risk based economic capital approach to ICAAP enhances Board and Senior Management's ability to understand how much capital flexibility exists to support risk appetite and business expansion strategy. A well-designed ICAAP framework also makes the top management abreast of ALM concerns at the bank.
