Programme on NRI Business and Forex Facilities for Individuals

Background

In the Globalized world, India has a vast diaspora spread around the world in many countries. According to recent (2015) UN statistics, the number of migrants originating from India are the largest among all the other countries in the world. The large stock of migrants from India continues to have strong economic interest on the mainland. Their contribution in terms of remittances, deposits and investments lends significant support to the strength of India's Balance of Payments.

At the same time, the liberalization policy domestically followed in India has given rise to significant increase in demand for foreign exchange from residents. The demand comes for varieties of services that are permitted by the regulator and may give rise to outward remittance for which they approach a banker.

In this context, Indian banks have the arduous task of serving the growing needs of NRIs and individuals, at the same time maintain strict compliance with regulations. For instance, banker has to be very clear regarding different types of accounts permitted for NRIs and different account types of permissible transactions. On the individuals' facilities, there are certain schemes such as LRS and others. Apart from current account transactions, certain capital account transactions permitted by the regulator. The role of banker in undertaking such transactions is particularly important because under FEMA 1999, it is the banker who has to be satisfied with bonafides of the customer, KYC and AML compliances. In this backdrop, the current programme is intended to enrich the understanding of the bankers regarding NRI services and also enhance the skill level required in handling these services.

Objective

The programme has twin objectives. The first is to provide the bankers with a clear understanding regarding provisions in FEMA with respect to NRI services and also regarding the range of services permitted for NRIs and residents by RBI. The second objective is to provide focused training on handling of NRI business, customer delight and also expanding customer reach.
